Model 1

What and when: When I was in 6th grade, my school arranged a field trip in order to tour a botanical garden that showcased desert fauna. I was quite interested in desert ecology at the time, so I signed up to go.

Where: It was a trip to the largest botanical garden for desert plant-life in Beijing. I went there with several classmates and our biology teacher.

What: We travelled through the garden to see different cacti and shrub growth. Two researchers introduced these desert fauna, explaining where these plants grew from and how they were adapted to their habitats. Meanwhile, the two scientists gave us detailed explanations of how the root system of the plants collected enough water to ensure survival in arid conditions. Finally, we did an experiment to study the path that water follows through a plant.

Why: This was a very informative trip for me. I got to familiarise myself with different kinds of desert fauna and gained a deeper understanding of how water is absorbed by plants through a widespread yet shallow root system. Most importantly, I came to admire the adaptability of desert plants for their ability to survive in the face of harsh and inhospitable natural conditions.
