When, where, what: Last summer, I participated in an educational trip to Taiwan for three months as an exchange student for a summer semester study.

Who: I went there with three students from my department, who were all studying the same specialty as me.

What you did: During my time in Taiwan, I attended an intensive course of study on the field of public health. We focused on the examination of advanced healthcare systems of well-developed countries such as the UK and Singapore. At the end of the course, our instructors gave us a group project: design a sound healthcare system that maximised coverage while minimising costs. It was a valuable practical exercise of theoretical knowledge.

Why: This trip was a memorable learning experience for me. My knowledge of public health was deepened significantly thanks to my studies in Taiwan. I realised that the study of public health is a mean to improve our citizens' health and its people's lives. It is both a very promising as well as meaningful field. Since this trip, I have made up my mind to devote my whole life to this field.

You are required to talk for the full 2 minutes.

However, for young children, it may be too troublesome and even meaningless to take them along. Because of their youth, they might not be able to remember much of what they see. Additionally, travel is sometimes uncomfortable, and children might cause a disturbance to others if the situation turns too unpleasant.
