Model 1

Where: I visited a street market in a small town in Krabi, a city by the sea in Thailand. I went there for travelling with my friend last year.

What: It's a market that opens almost daily. Local people can buy all kinds of goods that are needed for daily life. The market also sells souvenirs to tourists as the tourism industry has become much more developed. I saw wallets made of coconut shells and sea shells there.

How big: The market is very big. There are hundreds of stalls selling all kinds of goods. My friend and I spent two hours walking from one side to the other side of the market.

Why: The street market in Thailand gave us a good impression. One reason is that there are many pretty and special souvenirs. I had never seen a wallet made of coconut shells before. Another reason is that I got a chance to experience the local culture in Thailand. It was a joyful experience.

Model 2

Where: In my hometown, there is an open-air market every five days. Last year, I went there with my family and I had a good time there.

How big: It's a small market. Only people who live in nearby villages come to it. The market is about 500 metres long. It opens from around 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

What: This open-air market offers daily supplies for local people. People in my hometown buy vegetables and food from the market. People can also buy clothes in the market.

Why: I had a good time there last year because it brought back all the good memories of childhood. Going to the market every five days used to be the happiest event when I was little. But now I don't have many opportunities to go there because I live far away from my hometown. It was great to see people I knew as a child selling goods that I knew I could trust.

You are required to talk for the full 2 minutes.
